RIPARIAN BUFFER ZONES INFLUENCE THE QUALITY OF MIDWESTERN STREAMS AND RIVERS Despite similar land use throughout (Porter, 2000b ). Organic enrichment the Corn Belt region of the Midwest, resulting from excessive algal production in some midwestern streams may differ considerably in their ecological characteristics, in part because of differences in riparian buffer zone requirements of aquatic organisms. This conclusion is based on an investigation of buffer zones may influence nutrient concentrations indirectly by reducing phytoplankton growth in the upper Mississippi River during August 1997 ( map streams where phytoplankton were shown at right; Sorenson and others, abundant ( often where buffer zones were thin or lacking ), dissolved nitrate 1999; Porter, 2000a ). Specifically, Illinois concentrations were significantly lower ( graph shown below; Porter, 2000b ). The lower nutrient concentrations indicative of good water quality may result from uptake by the stream quality, reduced nuisance algal abundance, and maintenance of sufficient dissolved oxygen concentrations from consideration of biological communities and the riparian zone, rather than aquatic organisms. For example, the...
