Excerpt: .interferes with the mowing, and injures the quality of the hay. The meadow should not be grazed too closely or too late in the fall, since late, close grazing will leave the grass with little winter protection and may result in weakening the plants so as greatly to retard their growth the next spring. Timothy is easily killed by too close grazing, but this is not equally true of all grasses. Permanent pasture grasses, such as Kentucky blue-grass and the wild prairie grasses, may be pastured late in the fall without injury, provided the grass has been allowed to make a vigorous growth in the late summer and early fall. This may often be accomplished on a well-managed farm, by using the meadow aftermath for pasture as described above, allowing the grass in the regular pasture to make a rank growth during the early...
