Excerpt: . . . 11 misreading of the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respected capabilities. And we do not agree that only the actions of developed countries should be submitted to a serious transparency and accountability regime, including peer review by other countries, while the major developing countries should be subject to no peer review at all unless the actions were paid for by developed countries. The mentality that looks at the world through those lenses will not produce an agreement in Copenhagen. We have to do better. After all, we are not engaged right now in a debating society about the exegesis of section X of subpart 1 of sub-subpart B of the Framework Convention or the Bali Action Plan. We are seeking to put in place a new agreement based, broadly on the concepts of those underlying documents, to be sure, intended to safeguard our future and the future of our children, to take an important...
