Not illustrated. 1835 Excerpt: .the fresh blowing wind and the brisk exercise was undone at once by this unhappy rencounter. She heard her heart beating violently, and when she reached a knoll at the end of the lane, (a place she felt she should not soon have the courage to enter again,) she found it necessary, though so very near home, to pause, from exhaustion of feeling as well as weariness of body. The knoll commanded a pretty view, for it was the highest land in the neighbourhood, and overlooked the entire village, which, with its ancient trees, and its redtiled roofs, crowned with their wreathing smoke, looked placid and cheerful, even on that gloomy autumn afternoon, when the few leaves still hanging on the boughs were pale and sere, and but little of the verdure of the turf remained. As if in entire consonance with the mood of the weather, the bell was tolling slow and solemn from the church tower: and a village funeral came winding up the hill, and, passing close to the spot where Margaret was resting, descended on the other side. In nothing is the difference between town and country so strongly marked, as in all that concerns the coming of death, and the traces he leaves behind him. Here were no mutes, no nodding plumes, no hearse: the coffin was simply borne on the shoulders of four plain men; but behind it came mourners, weeping in all the bitterness of honest grief, and...
