[...]room then came the sage Emerson with a sunbeam in his face; the cast-iron man Thoreau, long-nosed, queer-mouthed, ugly as sin, but with whom to talk is like hearing the wind among the boughs of a forest tree; Ellery Channing, with his wife and her illustrious sister, Margaret Fuller; the gifted George William Curtis, then tilling a farm not far from the Manse, long before he lounged in an Easy Chair; genial Bradford, relative of Ripley, and associate and firm friend of Hawthorne; Horatio Bridge, of the African Cruiser and of the recent Hawthorne Recollections; the critic George Hillard, at whose house Hawthorne was married; Prince Lowell, the large-hearted; Franklin Pierce, Hawthorne's life-long friend. Concerning the discussion of things physical and metaphysical, to which these old walls then listened, the host gives us little hint. Sometimes the guests were feasted on nectar and ambrosia by the new Adam and Eve; sometimes they listened to the music of the spheres which, for private convenience, is packed into a music-box, -left here by Thoreau when...
